Semiconductor optical devices such as lasers and detectors are used for a variety of optical applications including, but not limited to, optical communications, imaging, printing, and medical technologies. A number of these applications, such as optical communications and imaging technologies, require optical signal conversion and amplification for improving device performance. Optical devices such as lasers and detectors typically produce a single wavelength signal. In optical communications, for example, the optical output of the device may be of a single wavelength to carry information. In imaging applications, the output of a detector may be an array of photodetectors that produce an electrical signal in response to the detected amount of light at each pixel of the array. The single-wavelength, single-mode, or multi-mode nature of a device's output signal may be utilized by optically coupling the output signal of the device to an optical fiber or waveguide. In one type of device, the optical output signal may be coupled from the device and redirected to a single optical fiber by a mirror. In another type of device, a folded optical path may be used to couple the output signal to a waveguide or optical fiber. Either of these configurations, however, may have certain disadvantages such as poor coupling and inefficient use of space. In addition, many devices, such as quantum cascade detectors, exhibit complicated structure and, as a result, an increased risk of defects. These defects generally cause the device to be unusable. As a result, it is difficult to increase the reliability of such devices. Thus, a need exists in the art for an improved optical device./* * JBoss, Home of Professional Open Source. * Copyright 2011, Red Hat, Inc., and individual contributors * as indicated by the @author tags.
