P2Y(12) receptors are most ubiquitously expressed in human and rodent smooth muscle. They were originally found to mediate platelet shape change and aggregation. Upon activation, this receptor couples to G proteins by which it activates phospholipase C and initiates secondary signaling cascades that lead to platelet activation. P2Y(12) receptors are of great importance in regulating platelet function in pathological conditions such as acute coronary syndromes. Furthermore, studies in human and rodent arteries have demonstrated that P2Y(12) receptors are the predominant purinergic receptors in the vasculature, and that their activation elicits vasoconstriction. The experiments described in this review were conducted using two human P2Y(12) receptor cDNAs from a cerebral aneurysm patient and a Wistar-Kyoto rat. These studies were the first to demonstrate, using site-specific mutagenesis, that the majority of the amino acid sequences of the human P2Y(12) receptor are homologous to their rodent counterparts. In addition, these studies established that the adenine nucleotide triphosphate and analog binding domains of the human P2Y(12) receptor have the hallmarks of the class-II GPCRs but, interestingly, not the adenine nucleotide binding pockets. Finally, it was shown that the P2Y(12) receptor activates phosphatidylinositol-3 kinase to elicit platelet shape change
